Why we prefer this card

A prescription search says a lot about a person. When your office hands a patient a discount card, you're vouching for it. We share RxGo because of what its own legal privacy terms say:

> “We do not sell personal information. We do not sell, rent, license, or otherwise transfer your personal information — including prescription search history, contact information, or health-related data — to any third party for commercial purposes.”

> “We do not share health data with advertisers. We do not share your medication searches, prescription history, or any health-related information with advertising platforms, data brokers, or marketing companies.”

What it is

- A free prescription discount card and app: no membership fee, no account needed to see a price.
- Discounts at participating pharmacies; savings vary by drug and pharmacy. The patient pays the discounted price.
- For prescriptions the patient pays for themselves. It can't be combined with insurance or any government program.

What we're asking: keep the cards at the front desk, and when a patient mentions paying cash for a prescription, hand them one before they leave. That's it.
